EUR/USD below $1.15

Investor sentiment was holding a risk averse tone yesterday amid concerns over stretched valuations. Data-wise, the US and European macro calendars were devoid of any notable economic releases. At the close on Wall Street last night, the S&P 500 was 1.2% down on the day. On bond markets, 10-year yields were generally 1-2bps lower across the main sovereign benchmarks. Meanwhile, on commodity markets, gold continued to move back from its recent record highs, trading below the $4,000/oz mark.

On the currency front, the dollar maintained the upper hand and managed to generate some further upward momentum. It benefited from safe haven demand amid the risk averse mood that prevailed yesterday. The recent reduction in trade tensions between the US and some of its key trading partner has helped to reinstate to some extent the dollar's safe haven appeal. The less dovish tone from the Fed last week has also been a support for the currency. Elsewhere, sterling remained under pressure. The pound was not helped by the increased potential for tax hikes in the upcoming Budget, following comments from Chancellor Reeves.

The firmer tone to the dollar yesterday was evident in the EUR/USD pair being unable to hold onto the $1.15 level, trading to a low of $1.1474. Meantime, a combination of a stronger dollar and sterling weakness saw GBP/USD fall below the $1.31 handle. The softer sterling tone was also reflected in EUR/GBP moving back above 88p.

Looking ahead to today, we get some private sector data from the US to fill the void arising from the lack of government releases. The ADP employment report, while not a reliable guide to official payrolls, will at least provide an update on the labour market for October. Meanwhile, the publication of the non-manufacturing ISM survey for October will be assessed as a leading indicator of activity levels in the US economy.
