

Euro under some slight downward pressure

Investor sentiment was holding a cautious tone throughout yesterday. Oil prices remained elevated, with Brent crude staying north of $107 per barrel. Reports indicate that crude exports from the Middle East reached its highest level since the war started in September, but that the US & China have slowed running down their reserves of oil. Against this backdrop, the Euro Stoxx 50 finished flat for the day, while the S&P 500 declined by 0.8%.

In terms of fixed income, sovereign bond yields continued to move higher. UK Gilt yields rose by 3-8bps, led upwards by the front-end of the curve. Meantime, US Treasury yields climbed 3-6bps higher. In contrast, long-dated German Bund yields increased by 2-4bps, but the policy sensitive two-year yield fell by 2bps.

The slight decline in front-end German yields coincided with a modest softening in Eurozone market rate expectations, following remarks from ECB President Lagarde. Speaking at the European parliament, Lagarde stated that the ECB sees "higher inflation ahead but no signs yet that it is becoming embedded", and that "a measured response" is needed by the ECB. She also indicated that rising bond yields may reduce the need for higher official rates.

On the currency front, the euro was under some slight downward pressure yesterday. As trading gets underway this morning, this sees EUR/USD open nearer to the midpoint of $1.13-1.14. EUR/GBP is operating in the top half of the 85-86p band GBP/USD continues to change hands in the lower half of $1.32-1.33. USD/JPY is close to the halfway mark of the ¥157-158 corridor.

Turning to the day ahead, the EC sentiment indices for September are due. In the US, the JOLTS job openings figure (Aug) and consumer confidence (Sep) will warrant some attention.
